Queen l'icioria's Chickens.

When Queen Victoria was a little girl, be-fere thoughts of the English throne had ever entered her baby head, she was the owner of a very fine coop of Cocain China fowls. There were very large white roosters, beautiful, plump hens and downy chicks by the dozen, for the coop was a very large one. But the pet of all the pets was a big rooster, who had learned to know his little mistress and to follow her around the inclosure where he was kept. Many photographs were taken of the Cochin China fowls, and later, when the little Victoria grew to be a woman and was called to the English throne, she took her Cochin China fowls with ber and had them installed at Grasse, one of her country seats. They are still at Grasse, and for a generation the Queen's children and grandchildren have played with them and admired them. Last summer little Lady Alexandra Duff, the Queen's little great-granddaughter.was taken to Grasse, and one day her nurse led her out to where there was a coop of beautiful Cochin China hens and chickens, all descended from straps: the lacing is in front, the back being the ones the baby Victoria played with sixty
